Dear Sir or Madaam,

Without the net neutrality provisions enacted by the previous FCC board and reprovisioning ISPs as Title II service providers (which by all measures is the only way to do so as the Internet will inevitably be more ubiquitous and important to the nation than simple voice communication if it isn't already), the corporations behind our infrastructure will do exactly as they are beholden to their shareholders, which is to maximize profits. That profit motive is in direct conflict with the preservation of a free and open playing field for all currnt upcoming actors in the Internet and information economy, regardless of size. I am strongly, strongly against the removal of these extremely important guidelines that have been put in place to protect the citizenry and in no way inhibit the free flow of information.

Sincerely,

Adam Curtis
